Coordination as a Collateral Benefit: Lab-in-the-Field Evidence from a Conditional Cash Transfer Program (Job Market paper).

Conditional cash transfer (CCT) programs have positive effects on health and education. Using a novel approach, this economic field experiment tests a collateral benefit of one such program: an improvement in coordination. We ran a minimum effort coordination game on a sample of 714 CCT beneficiaries in Colombia and find evidence of overcoming risk uncertainty. The data we gathered is sufficiently rich to establish that the improvement in coordination is not due to potential confounds such as willingness to cooperate (measured with a public goods game), connectivity (measured with network data for each participant within a session) or socio-economic characteristics.

The experimental design features Pareto ranked equilibria. I find evidence that those exposed to the program for over a year are not just coordinating; they are more likely to exert the highest level of effort and reach higher earnings. A structural model of the effort decision suggests the CCT improved beliefs about others' behavior, creating a coordination device.

CCT beneficiaries are required to interact with local program officials, but more importantly with community leaders and fellow beneficiaries. I argue that this gave rise to a social norm. The findings support nascent initiatives to influence beliefs through policy instruments.

Prosocial behavior, Heterogeneity and Incentives: Experimental evidence from the local commons in Colombia. I examine efficiency of incentives by estimating a structural model of social preferences. The paper studies the role of composition of preference types in the groups with 1095 participants.

Work pays: different benefits of a workfare program in Colombia. With Orazio Attanasio, Costas Meguir (Yale University), Marcos Vera-Hernandez (UCL) and Arthur Alik (University of Toulouse). We examine the effects of a workfare program in Colombia. We find that the program increased individual labor income and labor supply. The effect of the program persisted beyond its operation in rural areas.

Identification of Other-Regarding Preferences: Evidence from a Common Pool Resource Game in Colombia. With David Echeverry (University of California Berkeley). We identify individuals' types by using a structural latent class model and compare the results with the structural parameters estimated from a Quantal Response Equilibrium model.

Motivating Teamwork in Organizations: Lab-in-the-Field Evidence on Cooperation and Social Recognition. This economic field experiment tests the effects of public and private recognition on voluntary contributions to a public good within an organization. Using a within-subjects design, 410 Colombian employees participated in an online public goods game. The analysis reveals that public recognition has a sizeable effect on contributions, while private recognition has a small effect.

Parental generosity and early child development: an experimental approach. I designed an economic experiment to measure parents' willingness to invest in their children's human capital.

Leading by non-example: do leader's social preferences matter for cooperation? Experimental evidence from Colombia. In 2014, I conducted an artefactual field experiment with 500 beneficiaries of a CCT in Colombia and examine whether how powerful leaders are determines their decision to free ride and the relationship between individual willingness to cooperate and the presence of an empowered leader in the group.

Darwin in the experimental lab: between and within group competition effects on human behavior. I examine the effect of between group and within group competition by using a Public Goods game we conducted in 2007 with the sample of Cárdenas, et al. 2008 (above)
