Coordination as a Collateral Benefit: Lab-in-the-Field Evidence from a Conditional Cash Transfer Program (Job Market paper).

Conditional cash transfer (CCT) programs have positive effects on health and education. This economic field experiment tests the collateral benefits of a CCT program on improving coordination. A novel minimum effort coordination game captures the ability to overcome risk uncertainty within a sample of 714 CCT beneficiaries in Colombia. There is a sizeable effect of the CCT program on coordination, as those exposed to the program for over a year are more likely to exert the highest level of effort and reach the highest level of earnings possible.

In this CCT program, beneficiaries not only have to comply with health and education requirements but also interact with local program officials and community leaders, school and health care officials and other neighbor beneficiaries. Beneficiaries also have the choice to attend other group meetings that provide support to community-based initiatives, teamwork, group identity, and solidarity. Though this raises different possible channels, the analysis reveals that the improvement in coordination is not due to potential confounds such as cooperation (measured with a public goods game), connectivity (measured with network data for each participant) or socio-economic characteristics.

Beliefs about what others will do and about what should be done determine whether individuals choose the highest level of effort. A structural choice model of the individual decision to coordinate highlights the role of beliefs about others’ behavior: Only high beliefs sustain high effort equilibrium. The findings support nascent initiatives to influence beliefs through policy instruments.

Prosocial behavior, Heterogeneity and Incentives: Experimental evidence from the local commons in Colombia. I examine efficiency of incentives according to a structural estimation of the composition of social preferences’ types in the groups with 1095 participants .

Work pays: different benefits of a workfare program in Colombia. With Orazio Attanasio, Costas Meguir (Yale University), Marcos Vera-Hernandez (UCL) and Arthur Alik (University of Toulouse). We examine the effects of a workfare program in Colombia. We find that the program increased individual labor income and labor supply. The effect of the program persisted beyond its operation in rural areas.

Identification of Other-Regarding Preferences: Evidence from a Common Pool Resource Game in Colombia. With David Echeverry (University of California Berkeley). We identify individuals’ types by using a structural latent class model and compare the results with the structural parameters estimated from a Quantal Response Equilibrium model.

Manuscripts in Preparation

Motivating Teamwork in Organizations: Lab-in-the-Field Evidence on Cooperation and Employee Recognition. This economic field experiment tests the effects of public and private recognition on voluntary contributions to a public good within an organization. Using a within-subjects design, 410 Colombian employees participated in an online public goods game. The analysis reveals that public recognition has a sizeable effect on contributions, while private recognition has a small effect.

Parental generosity and early child development: an experimental approach. I designed an economic experiment to measure parents' willingness to invest in their children's human capital.

Leading by non-example: do leader's social preferences matter for cooperation? Experimental evidence from Colombia. In 2014, I conducted an artefactual field experiment with 500 beneficiaries of a CCT in Colombia and examine whether how powerful leaders are determines their decision to free ride and the relationship between individual willingness to cooperate and the presence of an empowered leader in the group.

Darwin in the experimental lab: between and within group competition effects on human behavior. I examine the effect of between group and within group competition by using a Public Goods game we conducted in 2007 with the sample of Cardenas, et al. 2008 (above)
